What is CNG?

Compressed Natural Gas, also well known as CNG, is a fossil fuel comprising Methane (80% to 90%) and is substitute for other auto fuels such as petrol, diesel, Auto LPG etc. For use in automobiles as fuel, natural gas is compressed at high pressure of ~200 bar & dispensed to vehicles to enhance the vehicle's on-board storage capacity.

Types of CNG Station:

a) Online Station:

Online stations are connected with high pressure steel pipeline and have compression facility to further compress the natural gas to relatively high pressure. CNG is dispensed to vehicles locally through CNG dispenser at a pressure of ~200 bar. The setting up Online CNG station is subject to availability of pipeline connectivity near the proposed station.

b) Mother Station:

Mother Stations in addition to all the facilities of Online station have the facility to refuel the mobile cascades (LCV/HCV) in addition to the CNG dispensed to vehicles locally through CNG dispensers. The setting up Mother CNG station is again subject to availability of pipeline connectivity near the proposed CNG station.

c) Daughter Booster Station:

Daughter Booster stations do not have the connectivity of natural gas pipeline but have booster compression facility. At these stations, CNG is received through mobile cascades (by cylinders mounted on LCV/HCV) from Mother station. Direct filling of CNG is done through CNG dispensers and later the booster compressor is used to boost the pressure and CNG is dispensed to the automobiles. The Daughter Boosters station may be considered for up-gradation from Daughter Booster to Online or Mother CNG station after availability of pipeline connectivity near the station.

d) Daughter Station:

Just like Daughter Booster station, Daughter stations also do not have the connectivity of natural gas pipeline. CNG is transported through mobile cascades (by cylinders mounted on LCV/HCV) from Mother station and then dispensed to vehicles locally through CNG dispensers.
